About State Archives

North Carolina State Archives

The state archives are often one of my first stops when looking “outside the box.” By that I mean searching outside the Ancestry, FamilySearch or other platforms. They don’t have everything. Researching at the state archives in the area you are researching is your next stop (or at least high on your research priority list).

This handout and video are primarily focused on what’s online but know that most of the resources are not yet online.

If you are not finding what you need online, if possible, a visit to the state archives might be a great genealogy research trip.

Often, you’ll find the state archives also has a state library. Most of these state libraries focus on historical and genealogical materials.... most of which is not online but can be a valuable resource for genealogy.

North Carolina State Archives

In some states, the state library is managed by the state genealogical or historical society.

Also, some state archives have partnered with Ancestry.com and or FamilySearch.org to help digitize their records.

Searching State Archives Online

The links to each state's digital archives (below) is a good start. In some cases, you will likely need to do keyword research to narrow your results.

Experiment with difference searches and learn about how the collections are organized in the state you are researching. Each state is different. There is not a centralized format across all states. Keep in mind that with thousands of staff adding information, not every employee is going to use the same keywords across all state archives. You'll need to get creative in your keyword research.

Tips: Try searching by the surname of your ancestor. Search by locations. Search the word "genealogy" for manuscripts and finding aids.

Not Finding It?

Pay attention to when a state was created. It could be that what you seek is in another neighboring state archive from which it was formed.

Requesting Records

Do your homework before contacting the archives staff. All archives have online catalogs. The more specific information you can provide the faster you'll get results, in most cases.

Keep in mind that the pandemic has put a strain on many archives and libraries staff and may have a backlog of records/research requests.

Fees will vary from state to state.

Emailing the Archives

Due to antispam software at the state archives, sometimes your email will not reach the archives staff because of hyperlinks or attachments, if their software suspects might be suspicious. To avoid getting caught in a spam filter, use only text in your first email to them. Even signature graphics can get caught in the spam filters.

Also be patient. If you don't get a response in a couple of weeks, then try again or call them.

Planning a Trip

As of this writing, there are still some archives that are closed due to the pandemic, but many are reopening under various rules. Just about every archive website has a "Plan Your Visit" page. Be sure the check out the rules and times they are open. Call ahead to ensure that the days you are planning to be there, they'll be open. Sometimes the websites are not up to date.
